

SAPA Series with Caro Lundin

During springtime in 2020, as governments around the world made the panicked decision to lock down their countries in a bid to stop the spread of Covid-19, many predicted that this would spell the death of the co-working space. After all, how could the idea of bringing large numbers of people together around shared desks and common areas not lose its appeal in our new pandemic reality?

Club, after taking over a low-rent retail unit in Hackney. The style is a stripped-back, fuzz-free environment of 232m2 — designed with interiors decked out with a selection of low-cost and durable materials that Lundin felt reflected a climate where coworking is "a necessity and not a nice-to-have."

In this episode of Sapa Series, Lundin tells us more about what materials will likely emerge as hygienic, pandemic-adapted alternatives, how to design for social distancing, what technologies will be featured in shared offices of the future, and how coworking places can drive positive change in socio-economically disadvantaged areas.

<https://imagine.sapabuildingsystem.com/en/sapa-series/sapa-series-with-caro-lundin/>